

AEI STUDIES IN PUBLIC OPINION

POLLS ON PATRIOTISM AND MILITARY SERVICE

<http://www.aei.org/publicopinion9>

(updated July 2, 2007)

Compiled by Karlyn Bowman, Resident Fellow, AEI and Adam Foster, Research/Staff Assistant

Before September 11th 2001, substantial majorities consistently told pollsters that they were proud to be Americans. In a Gallup trend question from January 2001, for example, 55 percent described themselves as “extremely” proud of being an American and 32 percent “very” proud. Just 2 percent said they were “only a little” or “not at all” proud. In June 2006, when Gallup last repeated the question, 57 percent described themselves as extremely proud and 25 percent very proud. Six percent said they were only a little or not at all proud.

The events of September 11th produced overt displays of patriotism. People said they flew their flags more than in the past and they sang the Star Spangled Banner. Those activities have receded, but patriotic sentiment is still strong. According to a June 2006 Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll, 56 percent of those surveyed believed that Americans are more patriotic today than they were five years ago.

American patriotism is not blind patriotism. Polls show that Americans find a lot to criticize in their society. But they still love their country, and they are not reluctant to say so.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN TO BE A PATRIOT: Pollsters don't ask people what it means to be a patriot very often. Around 60 percent told New York Times interviewers in 1983 that it was enough to love your country to be patriotic. A third said you needed to "do something." More than seven in ten said serving in the military was a demonstration of patriotism. A few pollsters have explored obligations of citizenship, and their data are reproduced below.

MILITARY SERVICE: In the New York Times poll in the section above, a substantial majority of Americans said serving in the military was a sign of patriotism. The tables below provide some idea of how many people have served and are serving in the military. The military is also consistently one of the most positively viewed institutions in the country. Eighty-four percent of Americans gave the military a favorable rating according to the Pew Research Center's Core Attitudes survey taken December 2006 through January 2007.

WILLINGNESS TO SERVE AND FIGHT: In five questions asked between 1981 and 1995 by Gallup, around seven in ten said that they would be willing to fight for our country. About two in ten said they would not. A December 2004 question from Pew that uses a part of Stephen Decatur's formulation "my country right or wrong" finds 46 percent saying the statement "we should all be willing to fight for our country, whether it is right or wrong" comes closer to their own views, while an identical 46 percent say the statement "it's acceptable to refuse to fight in a war you believe is morally wrong" comes closer. These responses have been pretty stable over time.

In 2004, when Gallup/CNN/USA Today interviewers asked whether the country should return to the draft, only 14 percent said that it should. In October and November 2001, when Fox News and Opinion Dynamics asked whether the country should reinstate the draft if more soldiers were needed in the war against terrorism, about three-quarters favored the idea. When the question was repeated in April 2004, 41 percent approved of reinstating the draft.

UNITED OR DIVIDED?: We have found a small number of questions on national unity from the past, starting in the Vietnam war. They are displayed below. In November 2004, 34 percent of Americans said were united and in agreement about the most important values. In 1998, 31 percent gave that response. In November 2001, 74 percent said we were.

- Which statement comes closer to your own views: Americans are united and in agreement about the most important values, or Americans are greatly divided when it comes to the most important values?

ATTITUDES OF YOUNG PEOPLE: In his book Surprise, Security, and the American Experience, historian John Lewis Gaddis relates a story about a classroom experience after 9/11. “Would it be OK now for us to be patriotic?” a student asked the professor. Gaddis replied, “Yes, I think it would.” Although we don’t have historical data on college students’ patriotism, a near majority of them (48 percent) in a poll taken soon after 9/11 described themselves as very patriotic and another 44 percent as somewhat patriotic. In October 2004, those responses were 39 and 49 percent, respectively. Young people, like their elders, are not enthusiastic about reinstating the draft.

- When it comes to your feelings about being an American, do you consider yourself very patriotic, somewhat patriotic, not very patriotic, or not at all patriotic? (Asked of college undergraduates)
